Connecting Points

Yesterday, we talked about something that is challenging for all of us. Minding our own business. There are many benefits for doing so, including reducing our stress. We also reconnect with ourselves and our life goals when we stay in our lane. If I'm minding your business or God's, who is minding mine?

Byron Katie says there are only three types of businesses in this universe. Other's business, God's business and my business. She gives some questions for us to answer so that we can start to develop the habit of asking if this is my business or not? Here are few examples...

My Business Their Business God's Business

- My Height
- Attending a Concert
- Rush-hour traffic
- My mother's depression
- The weather
- War in the world
- My brother's vegetarianism
- What I had for dinner
- My boss' anger
- My body

When you understand the three kinds of business enough to stay in your own business, it frees you to see your path much more clearly. I don't think the expectation is to be perfect at this practice but rather, to be more mindful about controlling yourself. I'm trying to remember that when I don't mind my own business, I create suffering for me and others.

I will leave you with a humorous response made when someone else was being nosy. "Stop asking why I'm single. I don't ask how you're still married."
